The Irish Ringfort Irish Settlement

Abstract. The landscape motif of the Irish rath, or ringfort, is closely associated with early medieval settlement in Ireland (400-1100 AD). Ringforts were circular or near-circular enclosures, typically constructed by digging a surrounding ditch, the material from which would be used to construct an adjacent earthen bank.

Ringfort - Wikipedia

A medieval ringfort that contained a jewelry workshop and substantial farming has been unearthed in an eye-opener archaeological discovery during a road project about a mile north of Roscommon town in Ireland. More importantly, however, 793 bodies were found during the excavation - and the archaeologists expect their analysis will reveal the whole tale of the ringfort.

Ringfort | Military Wiki | Fandom

The early Irish law tracts set out the size and morphology of enclosures and homes for various classes of people in early Irish society. For instance the bóaire or 'cow lord' was entitled to a house of 8.23m, an out-house of 4.57m, a kiln, a barn, a sheep-fold, a calf-fold and pigsty.. The term 'Ringfort' is probably something of a misnomer, as these sites were almost certainly ...
